HOUSE L ELSBETHEN, AUSTRIA

Effortlessness, privacy, an open and bright atmosphere as well as a flowing transition between inside and outside were the wishes laid out by the owners.

The clients wanted a house with an outbuilding and canopied entrance. The building has a shielding courtyard towards the bypassing street, providing both privacy and flow. Through terraces and balconies, the entire living space is enabled to engage with this secure but open area, also creating a connection to the south side garden. While the rectangular floor plan and steep gable roof align with the surrounding houses, the inside formulates a rather unconventional use of open space using nets spanning the living area. The bright and soft-looking ash wood installed by Fisher Parkett spans throughout the house adding to the light nature of the building.

Comfort and warmth is the primary focus of this resident building.

The flowing spacial figure across floors builds the center of the family home by linking kitchen, fireplace, dining area and diwan and simultaneously creating the unique character of the house – a home for daily use that offers coziness and support, implemented by carpenters Innovaholz and Tischlerei Speigner. The overall architectural concept can be seen as an approval of daily life rather than a stiff and inflexible construction.
